Volume 10
Women were admitted as undergraduates at Aberdeen University for the first time in 1894. A distinctive gown was created for them by making alterations to the epaulettes on the men’s gown, lengthening the collar into a V shape and providing wider sleeves. Also they were to wear a red tassel on their caps.

From the Editor

For this issue of Transactions of the Burgon Society we return (for the time being at any rate) to Great Britain. The variety of academic dress topics covered in the five articles could hardly be greater. These studies range historically from medieval to modern, including the present and possible future; from a six-hundred-year span to specific events in the mid-seventeenth century, at the turn of the twentieth century, and in the 1920s. They explore in detail the academic dress—actual and in some cases proposed but unadopted—of undergraduates, of doctors, and of members of a professional body. The geographical spread includes Scotland, London and Oxford (and beyond). Here we have research into contemporary records, debates and memoirs that reveal attitudes within institutions and their view of themselves in relation to the academic or professional community and the wider world. As well as examining how and why changes come about and traditions are established and evolve, our contributors identify myths and misconceptions hitherto accepted as fact.

The articles by Jonathan Cooper, Oliver Keenan and Alan Ross are versions of papers submitted for the Fellowship of the Burgon Society.

I would like to record thanks to Nicholas Groves, who has acted as managing editor for this issue, coordinating the review of the contributions, and to Kenneth Crawford and William Gibson, who have assisted as associate editors.
